

An Elementary Manual of Statistics (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from An Elementary Manual of Statistics¹. Statistics are numerical statements of facts in any department of inquiry, placed in relation to each other; statistical methods are devices for abbreviating and classifying the statements and making clear the relations. The elementary methods are based on arithmetical processes of an easy but specialized kind; more refined methods, necessary for certain classes of investigation, involve complex mathematical ideas.² Statistical treatment is necessary in a very great variety of cases, some of which may be distinguished as follows—Groups. - If a large number of things or persons have something in common, e.g. as members of the same nation, workers in the same occupation, houses in a defined locality, but differ one from the other in respect to some measurable characteristic, e.g. age, amount of wages, rateable value, together they form a statistical group. Groups can be represented by diagrams, tabulated in grades, or described in abbreviated form by averages.
