Not illustrated. 1880 Excerpt: ...he seeks intellectual pleasure? with greater avidity. The story becomes more complex as it advances, and is full of significations which are only cloaked by the action of the characters. In the first part of the Apprenticeship it seems as if the poet intended to sketch for us the happiness of purely sensuous existence. We are introduced into a charmed atmosphere of youth, love, and sunlight, where people lead a natural life, governed entirely by the and untroubled by any annoying scruples of conscience. Meister himself is an unique creation. Goethes masculine characters are always peculiar. They are made by a careful adjustment of intellectual sticks and straws, and one !can only comprehend them by being ever on the lookout for hidden meanings. Their smiles always hint of something metaphysical, and even their limbs move in an onerous fashion, as though they felt the burden of the principles they were intended to illustrate. Meister and Faust, however, are by no means empty works. We see so many sides of them that it is impossible at first to seize their personality. But in Meister especially, as the story unfolds for us, we perceive the nature of the man gradually assuming distinct form. It is like living beside him, and seeing him each day gather a new power from the action of circumstances. His intellect emerges from the meshes of a purely sensuous existence, until at last he stands before us, not a Godlike creature such as the developed Faust, but a large and noble man with rounded mind and tempered passions. There is nothing of the hero about Meister at any time. He is so inconsistent that we feel inclined to laugh and frown at him by turns, as we do at our fellow-men. He is in love with Philina, Mariana, the Amazon and Aurelia all ...
